

CH. 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN ART

“In Sumer, the foundations of religious structure emerged. Major natural forces were personified—treated, that is, as though they were human, but with enormously greater power, including the power of eternal life. Each such personified force or god took his or her place in a divine political society, ruled over by Anu, god of the sky. Each year the great gods met on New Year’s day to decide what would happen that year. The god lived in a house—the temple—and inhabited a cult statue. He or she had to be fed, amused, praised, etc. The descendents of Sumeria—the Greeks, Romans, Celts, Germans, and Slavs—continued to honor gods of sky, thunder, sun, moon, and the rest whose powers and character had first been deified by the speculations of ancient Sumerian priests. In Sumer, the wheel first rolled upon a grid work of city streets and cuneiform writing was first inscribed on clay. The Sumerians were not merely master architects and super hydraulic engineers; they were also the inventors of the military phalanx, a devastating and seemingly omnipotent weapon. From out of their imaginations came deep-sea merchants, formalized schools, epic poetry (The Epic of Gilgamesh), the arch, the city, traffic jams, pollution, and the world’s first great crisis in ecology. It was here, not Egypt, or Babylon, or Greece, or Rome, that men first codified rational laws to govern human behavior. They invented democracy, crude but recognizable, and the concept of empire, brutal and familiar.”
