19th CENTURY REALISM:

Realism was a term used to describe a certain type of art and literature in mid 19th century France. The style took root in the United States as well. Realism began around 1845 in France and lasted into the 1890's especially late in America. This movement rejected the subjective, emotional, and exotic characteristics of Romanticism. Instead, artists and writers concentrated on observable, contemporary reality. These artists were interested in depicting the down to earth everyday subjects of life. Landscapes; peasants; working class people, avoiding mythology, religion and history. Only the visible world is shown. The style is based on naturalism. The accurate depiction of contemporary life and nature was deemed more "truthful". These artists and writers were influenced by the more "realistic" artists of the past, Caravaggio, Rembrandt, Velazquez, & the LeNain Bros. Contemporary writers, like Charles Baudelaire, who called for "the heroism of modern life" as subject matter and the philosophy of Socialism, the European revolts of 1848 and the new invention of photography.

BARBIZON SCHOOL

Refers to the village of Barbizon on the edge of the Fontainebleau Forest, 30 miles southeast of Paris. This movement lasted from 1830-1860 in France but was very influential on American landscape painting well into the 1890's. Although part of the Realist movement, Barbizon School artists tended to cast a romantic and atmospheric glow onto their subjects. Their subjects were landscape and genre scenes of peasant life.

ARTS AND CRAFTS MOVEMENT

The movement's name derives from the Arts And Crafts Exhibition Society, founded in 1888, and the writings of the art critic John Ruskin. William Morris and Walter Crane are the leading artist / designers of the style as well as the influence of the Pre- Raphaelite Brotherhood. The high point of the movement in Britain was from 1860 up to the beginning of WW I in 1914. In America the style lasted well into the 20th century and has had several revivals in the subsequent years. The Arts & Crafts philosophy was a reaction to the sub-standard quality of mass produced goods of the Industrial Age. Instead, they advocated a return to the excellent craftsmanship that was characteristic of the medieval guilds .The writer, John Ruskin wrote about the detrimental effects, both aesthetic and social, of industrialization, but it took William Morris to translate these ideas into practical activity .The products of the Arts & Crafts Movement were hand woven, hand printed, hand carved designs and objects. Stylistically similar to medieval art the art objects encompassed everything from architecture to furniture to books and textiles, all executed with a sense of personal craftsmanship and a connection to nature in the materials and in the design. The movement also included a very humane, inclusive view toward workers and labor.

IMPRESSIONISM:

The derogatory term “Impressionism” was coined by critic Louis Leroy of the Parisian journal Le Charivari in response to the seemingly unfinished quality of Monet’s Impression: Sunrise of 1872, [exhibited at the first Impressionist Exhibition in 1874]. For Leroy, the work appeared more like an “impression” rather than a finished, factual painting. The artists in the exhibition came to like this term and adopted it for themselves. Edouard Manet was most certainly their inspiration, however he never exhibited with the group as an “impressionist”. But, undoubtedly his later works are part of the Impressionist sensibility. Edgar Degas, Claude Monet, Auguste Renoir, Mary Casatt, Berthe Morisot, Camille Pissarro are some of the leading painters of the style. As a group they held exhibitions from 1874 through 1886, [eight altogether]. These artists formed together as an opposition to the government sponsored Salon. Impressionist artists were concerned with the transient effects of light and atmosphere on natural or man made objects. The fragmented and painterly brushwork of Impressionism makes it a forerunner of the modern idea that a painting is an art object not subject to the constraints of nature. The group's aims were best represented by painters, though some sculptors, [Rodin, Degas , Renoir, Claudel } did manage to employ their concerns with light and reflection onto media other than paint and canvas. Toward the end many of the Impressionists pursued separate paths with respect to subject matter and style. Impressionism's "joy of life" attitude makes it one of the most loved and popular movements in modern art. The Impressionists championed subject matter of modern life including, cityscapes, portraits, scenes of Parisian life, the dance halls, the cafes, the bars, and ballet. Outdoor scenes, landscapes, were painted "Plein Aire" out of doors with a sense of the experience of nature not an academic approach. They leaned toward bright colors with visible strokes and an absence of glazing. The Impressionists also gave validation to the artist as a conduit, an essential part to the creation of art, not a mere slave to technique and observable fact.

POST IMPRESSIONISM

Post- Impressionism is a term that refers to the period after Impressionism. It was first used by the British art critic Roger Fry, as the title of his 1910 London Exhibition, "Manet and the Post-Impressionists". Almost all of the practitioners of this style had died by the time of the exhibition. The Post- Impressionists weren't reacting against Impressionism; they were trying to take the ideas and subject matter of Impressionism further. They were not interested in the momentary effects or the preoccupation of naturalism that Impressionism expounded. The Post -Impressionists wanted to fuse Impressionism's ideas with a more lasting theory of art. One that would make it ageless and part of the history of art. Still, almost all of the Post- Impressionists went through an Impressionist stage. Since Post-Impressionism refers to a time and not a style, there are many styles occurring simultaneously. Some of the other styles at this time and influenced by Post-Impressionism are, Symbolism, The Nabis, Art Nouveau, and the later styles of The Fauves, Cubism, and German Expressionism. The leading Post-Impressionists had a very personal and emotional approach to their art. They each believed in a theory of color as form that would shape their composition.

SYMBOLISM:

A term first used in reference to a certain style and subject matter in French Literature and Poetry around 1886. In early 1892 the term was applied to the visual arts by the critic G. Albert Aurier. In 1886 the writer Jean Moreas wrote a Symbolist Manifesto regarding music and literature, in which he rejected the everyday, contemporary world popular with the Realists and Impressionists in favor of timeless myths. Aurier made the visual connection to these ideas using Gauguin's imagery and use of color. The term has come to refer to subjective, and anti Realist tendencies in art and in literature. The Symbolists were interested in the exotic, the erotic, the spiritual, the occult, and the mystical. Some Symbolists artists drew their subject matter from Symbolist Poetry. Subject matter such as the femme fatale or themes dealing with sin and death became very popular. The grand epic story overshadowed the everyday. The Symbolist artists shared a sense of subject not really a sense of style. There were many different approaches to the stylistic and formal considerations of the movement. Some artists used a style nearer to Neoclassicism, some Romanticism, brushy and gestural, still others a more Expressionistic approach. Artists as diverse as Paul Gauguin, Edvard Munch, Gustave Moreau, Pierre Puvis de Chavannes, Aubrey Beardsly, Odilon Redon, James Ensor, Albert Pinkham Ryder and even Pablo Picasso worked in the Symbolist style. Again, not really a style as much as an approach, which was manifested in a melancholy fin de siecle, [end of the century] attitude. Symbolist Poets believed there was a connection between the sound and the rhythm of their words and the word's meaning. Symbolist Painters continued this thought and believed that color and line could be expressive of ideas and emotions.

NABIS

The Hebrews used the term "Nabi" for "prophet", in 1888 the poet Henri Cazalis appropriated the word and applied it to the group of young, Parisian poets and artists who were attracted to Paul Gauguin's Brittany paintings. They were also part of the larger Symbolist movement. As their name suggests, they were interested in mysticism, Eastern faiths, and religion in general. The group was actually a semi-secretive society. In addition to painting and poetry they were interested in theater, poster design, crafts and stained glass. The Nabi's believed that, on a basic level, every painting is a collection of colors. They sought to organize those colors into beautiful, harmonious compositions, which often have a decorative look. Through the use of non-naturalistic colors and flat shapes often outlined in dark, thick line the art has a distinctive medieval quality to it. They opposed the Realists and to a large degree, the Impressionists as well.

ART NOUVEAU

The name derives from Seigfried Bing’s Parisian shop, opened in 1895, L’Art Nouveau, {The New Art}. The shop sold new and original designs. The style had emerged more than a decade earlier under different names in different countries, but came to be known as Art Nouveau. It is a self-conscious style that saw itself as modern. It refers mainly to architectural and design concerns, some visual artists, such as, Gustave Klimt, Aubrey Beardsley and Alophonse Mucha contain striking elements of the Art Nouveau style. The goal was to raise the standards of the crafts, [furniture, graphic design, textiles, glassworks, and jewelry to the level of the “fine arts” Architects and designers used such varied materials as stained glass, mosaics, cast and wrought iron, etc. They rejected the 19th century trend of drawing literally from historical sources, such as Neo-Classicism and instead looked to nature for inspiration. Their subject matter was usually organic and flowing, movement and a sense of the erotic seems always present. Leaves, stems, flowers, the curve of the landscape or the female form, anything sinuous was at the heart of the Art Nouveau style.

VIENNA SECESSION

During the last decade of the 19th century, progressive artists in Germany and Austria found themselves at odds with the official artists' organizations and establishment. They therefore "seceded" or broke away from the traditional groups. These breakaway groups were given the title "Secession" or "Sezession". The most important Secessionist groups were in Munich, Vienna, and Berlin. The Vienna Secession was founded in 1897 by Gustave Klimt, whose Art Nouveau and Symbolist leanings determined the initial outlook of this group. Klimt was also the group's first president. Like Art Nouveau, members of the Vienna Secession wanted to raise the status and quality of the arts and crafts to that of fine art. In many ways, the Vienna Secession was the main conduit for Art Nouveau as a style in Austria. The Berlin Secession was officially formed in 1899, though one of the reasons for its founding dates back to 1892. In that year Edvard Munch exhibited about 50 paintings at The Society of Berlin Artists. These paintings caused a furor at the Society. The radical wing of the Society, led by Max Liebermann resigned and later formed the Berlin Secession. The group would split again in 1910 and form the Neue Sezession. From this group would come the many artists that would dominate the German Expressionist Movement of the early to mid 20th century. Some of the artists include Emil Nolde, Max Pechstein, Wassily Kandinsky and Alexji Jawlensky.

FAUVES:

The first original painting style of the 20th century emerged in 1905. A group of young artists inspired by recent exhibitions of the life works of Paul Cezanne, Vincent Van Gogh and Paul Gauguin as well as the emergence of tribal arts from Africa and Oceania exhibited in the museums of Paris, began to show their paintings. The Fauves, {wild beasts}, so named by critic Louis Vauxcelles, shocked the public with their bold use of color and distorted forms. Ultimately, a short-lived group, whose connection was a shared a sense of liberation and experimentation. Most of the artists found it hard to sustain their inspiration in this form and so moved on to other styles and concerns. But, undoubtedly, the Fauvist experiment would leave a lasting impression on subsequent Expressionist movements throughout the 20th century. The Fauves subject matter would follow the previous generations interest in the poetic, the landscape and scenes of modern life. The most lasting of these subjects were the idylls of Henri Matisse. He captured a sense of a time before civilization, when man and beast lived in harmony, in nature, before the pressure of modern life. Matisse would keep this poetic vision throughout his long career.

EXPRESSIONISM IN GERMANY

The Fauves had a decisive influence on the expressionist artists of Germany, as did the art of Edvard Munch and the Secessionist groups. But the Northern mind had a deeper, emotional, sometimes even morbid approach to their expressions. The German psyche was one of introspection and when combined with experimentation in art it came out in vibrant, raw, spontaneous creations filled with anxiety and sexuality. Die Brücke, [The Bridge}, was the first group to emerge. Centered in Dresden, these young artists led bohemian lives and exalted in the avant- garde. Ernst Ludwig Kirchner was the leader of this freethinking group. This initial German Expressionist group was also the first to connect with the tradition of graphic arts in Germany. The woodcut and the etching were revived under this modern style. A second group emerged in 1911 led by the Russian émigré Wassily Kandinsky. They called themselves “Der Blaue Reiter”, [The Blue Horseman [. Some of these artists would also be influenced by Cubism. That tendency would push them towards abstraction. After WW I the debacle of the war and its aftermath would see yet another aspect to German Expressionism. Artists who survived the war would use their art as way to play out their feelings and concerns of a world gone mad. The German Expressionist movement would embrace many styles and ideas from Cubism to Dada, but would always have at its core the raw emotional content of the early movement. German Expressionism would last throughout the first half of the 20th century and even have a revival in the 1970’s and 80’s.

DER BLAUE REITER: 1911-14

Kandinsky and the other artists adopted the name Der Blaue Reiter for their new group and its almanac, which they published from 1912-1914. This second group of German Expressionist Painters was more international than Die Brücke. There were three main approaches to art for these artists, the spiritual, the expressive and the abstract. They wanted their art to embody spiritual concerns, which they believed had been neglected by earlier art styles.

This term, coined by Louis Vauxhalles in 1908, after hearing Matisse refer to a painting by Braque as nothing but “ little cubes “. Like Impressionism and Fauvism the term was originally derogatory. The earlier phase of Cubism, Analytical Cubism, the subjects were depicted as if seen from multiple angles simultaneously. Traditional perspective was abandoned and the depicted space appeared fragmented and shallow. The brushstrokes were faceted and the color was muted and often dull. Synthetic Cubism, the later manifestation, color was used as a unifying element to the composition as well as actual collage elements. The introduction of lettering, and text as well as pattern lent itself to the new compositions making them more accessible to the viewer. Pablo Picasso and Georges Braque are the pioneers in this style, they’re experimentation and move towards abstraction would inspire much 20th century artmaking in the visual arts and literature and music. This style created a new language for art and would influence all painting and sculpture from this time forward.

Orphism:

The name was coined by the writer / poet Guillaume Apollinaire in 1912 for paintings he saw in Paris by Robert Delaunay. Orpheus was the Greek god of music and lyrics. The term also has connections to the Symbolist musical term “Orpheque”, meaning, “entrancingly lyrical”. Delaunay and his followers associated with Orphism infused vivid colors into the somber tones of analytic cubism. They believed that musical, literary or visual sensations had equivalents in other mediums of expression. The earliest works have recognizable images, the later works, [by 1911], are abstract, kaleidoscopic patterns of geometric colors and shapes.

FUTURISM:

This self named group of mostly Italian artists believed that society’s redemption lay in the future. Filippo Tommaso Marinetti, a poet, called the group together in his “Futurist Manifesto” of 1909. The manifesto became the rallying cry for these artists, hardly more than a group of acquaintances until Marinetti’s call. The manifesto called for the destruction of museums and libraries, and the glorification of all things machine like, especially speed and violence. The group hoped for a New World order to emerge in the new machine age. War was the cleansing process. It would eliminate the status quo and redefine civilization. Marinetti wrote: “ A speeding car is more beautiful than ‘The Victory of Samothrace’”. These artists tried to merge speed with the static painted or sculpted image. Some of these artists would not survive WW I, the remaining would join with the Facist movement of Benito Mussolini in the 1920’s.

CUBO-FUTURISM: 1913-1915

Kasimir Malevich first used this term to describe his own works, which he exhibited in Moscow in 1913. Cubism and Futurism, and also the folk art of Russia influence the aesthetic. It has a firm philosophy grounded in the traditions of Russian peasant culture and the new modern industrial age. Malevich would move onto other ideas and styles, but this would be his foundation philosophically. Other artists, Popova, Larionov and Goncharova would call this same style “RAYONISM”

SUPREMATISM: 1915-1923

Again Malevich used this term to describe his own paintings in a 1915 exhibition in Petrograd. Suprematism reflects Malevich’s belief in having reached the ultimate point in artistic expression. He believed his art conveyed an intellectual and spiritual essence. In his words: “the supremacy of pure feeling” A reductive process, form and color are minimized. Suprematism is the first fully abstract geometric art style.

CONSTRUCTIVISM: 1913-1920'S

The name of this group comes from the “Realist Manifesto” written by Tatlin, Pevsner and Gabo in 1920. One of their directives was “to construct art”. The Constructivists rejected conventional artmaking techniques in favor of utilitarian designs and materials for mass production. Art must apply to social and industrial needs. Most of their artworks were abstract or non-representational, but still, much of what they designed was functional. Architecture, textiles, theater design, graphics, all are functional but the forms are abstracted. Their sculpture are some of the first totally abstract art ever made and their use of industrial materials would open up a whole new world to later artists.

DE STIJL : 1917-1931

The term literally means “ The Style “ in Dutch. Sometimes also called “neo-plasticism” after a 1920 treatise by Piet Mondrian. This group of artists believed in absolute artistic purity and rejected the subjectivity of the individual artist in an effort to create a more universal, spiritual art. De Stijl artworks are always non-objective, with a minimal geometric design, often using straight lines, right angles and the primary colors red, yellow, blue, augmented with white and black.

THE BAUHAUS: 1919-1933

Founded in Weimar, Germany the Bauhaus, [“building house”], was the first truly modern art school .The Visual Arts, Architecture and Functional design were all studied and applied as related activities at the Bauhaus. Many of the designs were intended for mass production. They included architecture, furniture, typography, graphic design, ceramic, and textiles. The Bauhaus is really an institution not a style. The teachers came from a wide background of styles and philosophies bringing the most up to date ideas to the creative process. Walter Gropius, first director and founder would design the campus and buildings, Mies van der Rohe, third director, would become one of the leading architects in the International Style that would dominate architecture for most of the century, Theo van Doesburg, a leading De Stijl artist, Wassily Kandinsky, one of the founders of Non-Objective Art, El Lissitzky, Constructivist, Josef Albers, Laszlo Moholy-Nagy, Lionel Feininger, all, major abstract artists. The Bauhaus legacy would continue even up to today as the model for an arts education in the Universities and Art Institutes. The Nazis would close the Bauhaus in 1933, but its teaching staff and students would fan out across the globe to bring the Modernist aesthetics and goals to rest of the world.

DADA :

Rumanian poet, Tristan Tzara, along with a group of poets and artists, stuck a penknife randomly in a French Dictionary. The knife stuck on the word “dada” a word that meant “hobbyhorse” in French but in most languages was nonsensical, babytalk. This term appealed to the group. Dada, as a movement would spring up organically in several cities in different countries in the west. Eventually they would all adopt this name “Dada “. Zurich, Switzerland, Barcelona, Spain, Hamburg, Cologne, & Berlin, Germany, New York, USA, and of course, Paris, France. Having seen the horrors of “modern “ society in bringing about the First World War, the Dadaists embraced the irrational, the intuitive, nihilistic, absurd and playful. They were for anything anti-modern or anti-rational. Dada has even been referred to as anti-art. They saw themselves as anarchists, calling for an end to culture, as we know it. They wanted to break down the museums and get rid of all the art of the past; in fact, they felt that way about civilization in general. Break down all the institutions and conventions of society and start over. Such a group couldn’t stay together long. Many of the artists would embrace Surrealism as the heir to Dada. Dada is not really a style so much as a “world view”. Cubists, Expressionists, Abstractionists, could all take on the mantle of Dada and explore its rejuvenating ideas.

SURREALISM:

This term first used by Guillaume Apollinaire in 1917 in reference to his own writings, as well as the work of certain painters, such as Picasso and Marc Chagal. In 1924, one of the founders of Surrealism revived the term and expanded upon it in his “ Manifesto of Surrealism “, where he describes a “ super-reality” connecting the dream world and reality. The style originated in France but soon spread to the rest of Europe and North and South America. Although similar to Dada in irrationality, Surrealism is a more positive art philosophy in spirit. The movement is mostly concerned with different aspects of the unconscious mind and representations of the dream state. There are three main stylistic divisions of Surrealism. 1. Automatism, wherein the artist relinquishes conscious control of the creative act. 2. Veristic, in which the style is very realistic and detailed although the subject matter appears irrational. 3. Assemblage, in which unrelated objects are juxtaposed in a suggestion of an alternate reality.

AMERICAN MODERNISM IN THE EARLY 20TH CENTURY

American Modernism:

Of course there was a long tradition of American artists training in European art schools and the young American artists of the early 20th century were aware of the importance of the emerging philosophies and styles that were coming out of Paris, Berlin, London and other European art centers. But it was the Armory Show of 1913 that really brought home the advances in visual thinking that European artists had produced. As you may have guessed, many Americans found the “new “ art disturbing and antithetical to American culture.

AMERICAN SCENE PAINTING

This trend in American art was brought on by the disaster of WW I and the United States having to come to the rescue of its European allies. The devastation the Europeans brought upon themselves and the loss of American lives brought about an isolationist reaction to all things European. Many artists called for a return to American values, a rejection of European Modernism as foreign to American sensibilities. The movement gained headway slowly , but by that time Europe was heading for another conflict and the worldwide depression that began in 1929 emerged, American Scene Art was the dominant style as well as the philosophy of most Americans. American Scene artists would create mainly in a realistic style. Their subject matter would depict American life. Two main groups developed, The Regionalists, who painted mostly scenes of mid-western and southern states lifestyle and history, and The Social Realists, mostly from New York City concentrating on urban and social issues for their imagery. Some if not all of these artists saw the lesson in the formalism of European Modernism and used it to their own advantage, but often rejected the subject matter of the Europeans.

THE HARLEM RENAISSANCE

This title denotes a rebirth and emergence of artistic activity by African Americans in the Harlem area of New York City. It started off as a literary and musical revival of African American culture but soon spread to the visual arts. This is the “Golden Age” in American culture. So much of our shared culture emerged from the Black community at this time. It’s effects are still being felt today, not just in America but worldwide. One need only to look at the influence of “American Music “ on the world to see the strength of this movement. Their themes, when the style began in the 1920’s were based on historical narratives, social injustice and traditional African American culture.

MEXICAN MURALISTS

This movement emerged from the Mexican Civil War of 1910-1920. A shared cultural philosophy and a belief that art could play a role in the development of a new Mexican State empowered the artists of this period to take on large scale mural projects. No single style was called for, but the artists of this period tended to create in a mode of nationalist social realism. The movements influence was enormous, especially in the United States where the muralist taught American students and obtained many commissions.

SOVIET AND NATIONAL SOCIALIST REALISM

CHARACTERISTICS OF THIS PERIOD:

SOVIET SOCIALIST REALISM:

The rise of totalitarian communism in Russia brought about the end of the modernist experiment in eastern Europe. The political powers in the Soviet Union could only understand and tolerate art that was recognizable and served the state. Art became propaganda for the communist effort, its ideology was foremost, its style was representational and unambiguous.

NATIONAL SOCIALISM:

Hitler's Nazi Party put an end to the German Expressionist movement. Wanting to rid Germany of "degenerates" they created an all out war on Modernism, Bolsheviks , Jews and non-Aryan racial types. Like all totalitarian governments, the official art style was to serve the ideological cause and be unambiguous in its message.

THE NEW YORK SCHOOL

A general descriptive term referring to the art movements and styles that emerged in New York City during WW II and immediately afterwards. The styles within this title are: Abstract Expressionism, Action Painting, and Color Field Painting. The young artists of this generation had been influenced and taught by a variety of sources and to one degree or another assimilated those influences to create a unique style and philosophy of art. Their influences range from the American Scene and Mexican Muralist movements to the mass influx of European Modernists emigrating from war torn Europe.

ABSTRACT EXPRESSIONISM

A term first used by Robert Coates, in his article in the March 30, 1946 issue of the “New Yorker” magazine. Commenting on the contemporary painting style that had been emerging in the city throughout the war and just coming to fruition. The leading critics and apologists for the style, Harold Rosenberg and Clement Greenberg would give the style their own names, but it would be “Abstract Expressionism” that would continue to be used. Abstract with an emphasis on the artist expressing everything from personal feelings to universal, spiritual concerns. With the “Action Painters”, the physical act of painting becomes, to a certain extent, the subject matter. Not really a coherent style, far too individually motivated, so much as an attitude against traditional styles, techniques and the “finished” look of previous art styles. The artists shared a reliance on psychic self-expression, employing dripping, splattering and pouring of paint. A need to be spontaneous, intuitive and instinctive in the painting process. The Color Field Painters preferred a cooler, saturated and thin approach to paint application. Large surfaces of slightly modulated or opaque color. Both avenues of Abstract Expressionism produced large canvases. Scale was an heroic aspect to this extremely personal art form.

EXISTENTIALISM

POST WAR EUROPE

The experiences of post-war Europe during WW II produced profound implications in the art that followed those tragic years. An overall sense of despair and disillusion not unlike the years after WW I. Many artists chose to re-invent themselves and their creative style. The Existentialist Movement in western culture became the philosophical backbone for artists and writers trying to cope with the anguish and alienation of this new world. Spurred on by the writings of Jean Paul Sartre, Albert Camus,, and Samuel Beckett the post war artists grappled with ideas and concepts that simultaneously purge/confront/accept their individual wartime experiences. Different movements in different countries would create separate styles but all would be dealing with the existential questions of meaning, purpose and individuality. Many of these styles, listed below, took on the literary terms of Existentialism as the new language of art criticism and discussion. Terms and ideas such as: alienation, absurdity, transformation, new forms, metamorphosis, freedom become touchstones for the creative intellect.

POST WAR ASIA

Asia, particularly Japan picked up on the American Abstract Expressionist movement in the sense of performance or action. As Harold Rosenberg had written about “action painting” the process of making art as opposed to the “finished product” of painting appealed to Asian artists. The Gutai movement in particular, saw the action of art as the ultimate achievement of art. The ironic aspect of this movement is that the actual art that inspired it was unavailable to Japanese artists. It's the written word, the criticism and ideology that inspired them . In spite of American influences, the Asian Art of this period is closer to European Art . The search for a new meaning, and new forms was crucial and would give fruit in future generations that would be inspired by them.

TERMS TO KNOW

GUTAI

ANTIFORM

POP ART & THE NEW REALISM;

Short for “popular”. The term was first used by the British art critic Lawrence Alloway, which was published in the February 1958 issue of Architectural Design . In the US the term became widespread in the early 1960's when the magazines, Time , and Newsweek ran cover stories on the emerging style. Though it began in Great Britain, the style is mostly associated with American artists.

The movement was a reaction against the Abstract Expressionists, which was seen as too elitist and non-objective. Pop Art celebrated the Post-War consumer culture that had emerged . Pop Art tends to be playful and ironic, not spiritual or psychological, more low culture, less high culture. Pop Art appropriated the style and content of mass media, advertisements, comic strips, billboards, packaging and marketing , celebrity commodification and the raising of the commonplace to high art status. These artists are influenced by the Dadaist, especially Marcel Duchamp. Other influences are their contemporaries, Jasper Johns and Robert Rauschenberg.

OP ART:

Short for “Optical Art “, some affiliated titles are “Retinal Art “, and ” Perceptual Abstraction”. The term was coined by the artist George Rickey in 1964 in a conversation with two curators at the Museum of Modern Art in New York, where the styles defining art exhibition, “ The Responsive Eye “ was presented in 1965. These artworks are devoted primarily to optical illusions. Optical art often gives the illusion of movement, when in fact the human eye is what is moving, [vibration and pulsation], in response to the retinal information. Artists such as Josef Albers and his Bauhaus color theories were key to this art movement.

MINIMAL ART:

This term or “Minimalism” came from the writings of Barbara Rose, whose article entitled “ABC ART” made reference to art reduced to the “minimum” of basic forms and structures that appealed to artists of this generation. It was an art consisting of paintings and sculpture reduced to its essentials. An art that was neither expressive nor illusionistic. Associated mostly with sculpture often referred to as “Primary Structures” after an influential exhibition in NYC at the Jewish Museum in 1966. Painters of this philosophy created artwork of a highly reductive nature. Common images would be of a geometric shapes or solid color fields. These paintings are seemingly without content, presenting to the viewer only form.

CONCEPTUAL ART:

Ideas , or the written word that conveys the idea is of supreme importance. The "object" is just a product of the process. Marcel Duchamp is the proto-conceptualist. Always questioning the rules of art, the primacy of the eye. Conceptual Art would lead to the emergence of Earth Art and Body Art and Installation Art.

POSTMODERNISM

A decidedly contentious term, Post Modernism, never the less does define many of the issues, debates, and ideas of Late Modernism and its aftermath. It was originally used as a defining term for architecture that rejected the formalism of Modernism and Minimalism. Post Modernism is in a sense, a revival style. It borrows and references styles from the past and can even combine multiple styles within a single artwork. In this sense it is a continuation of the plurality of styles emerging in the late Modernist period. As architecture or sculpture, painting or mixed media, Post Modern artists explore the wide range of style, mediums and issues both formal and social of their era. Unlike Modernism's purity of materials and form, the Post Modern artist combines, blatantly, forms that create a dissonance, materials or images that seemingly can't "go together", but become fused in this new aesthetic. Like Late Modernism, the content can vary from one artist's viewpoint to another's. Post Modern artists found they could create statements on many subjects from culture to society, to form and to context. Anything and everything was available to be developed into a creative statement. This very act made art making more inclusive of style and materials so it was natural that that inclusiveness would encompass more viewpoints as well. Hence, multiculturalism, appropriation, deconstruction, self reflection become systems of thought by which one could engage the art of Post Modernism. It may be that Post Modernism is just an aspect of Modernism or a transition to a new philosophy, much like Mannerism bridged the Renaissance to the Baroque. Whatever the decision of history, Post Modernism has become the philosophical style of cultural and commercial globalization.
